Note: What is the difference between Japanese convenience stores and supermarkets?

The main differences between convenience stores and supermarkets are the sales floor area, prices, and opening hours:

- Store size: Convenience stores are typically between 30 and 250 square meters, while supermarkets are 250 square meters or larger. However, in some regions, there are "mini-supermarkets" that are similar in size to convenience stores.
- Opening hours: Convenience stores often have long operating hours, such as 24 hours, while supermarkets generally close around 8-10 pm.
- Price: Supermarkets have special sale days and discounts, but convenience stores generally sell at the regular price.
- Product range: Supermarkets are suitable for buying fresh food and cooking ingredients in bulk, while convenience stores mainly sell ready-to-eat meals, drinks, and daily necessities.
- Services: Convenience stores offer a wide range of services, including ATMs, utility bill payments, and parcel delivery services.
- Many drugstores feature an attached pharmacy for filling prescriptions and carry items such as medicines, cosmetics, and health foods. In addition, they handle a wide variety of other products, including fresh food and daily necessities.
